Vice President, External Relations, The Heritage Foundation

As world leaders attempt to craft an international global warming treaty this December and the U.S. Senate debates cap and trade, the world's poor face the threat of serious harm from radical climate policies. Our panelists will argue that a better reasoned—and more Biblical—approach to environmental stewardship emphasizes human flourishing. Calvin Beisner, the foremost evangelical expert on these issues, led the team that prepared this groundbreaking study of the science, economics, and theology of global warming. He will be joined by climatologist and author Roy Spencer (Rush Limbaugh's "official climatologist"), who served as an expert reviewer for the UN's Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), currently leads NASA's Aqua satellite atmospheric sensing research, and will explain why sound science doesn't support global warming fears; Charles van Eaton, an expert on public policy economics, who will examine the costs and benefits of alternative climate policies, particularly as those policies impact the poor; and Craig Mitchell, an evangelical theologian with science and economics background, who will address the ethical ramifications of climate change policy.
